TEGEL’S LAST SIGH

Julie Westerman

the air in airport gives up a sigh as the last departure…….. departs

But remember ‘If oxygen is required, masks will appear from panels above you.’

Tegel’s Last Sigh expels the air out of the airport, from its movement around the building to the woof of the radar boom, the psssh of the closing doors, the flapping of the wind sock, the blast of the hand dryers, and the roar of the last jet engine to blow windy eddies over the deserted tarmac apron: the last breath of Tegel airport.
